Investor groups have called for more restraint from boards in remunerating company directors during the economic downturn, after more than half of the nation's top 100 companies moved to increase the fee pool for directors over the past two years.....

Egan Associates principal John Egan says that boards should look to adjust their fees on a regular basis. “I think that one of the wisest things for boards to do is to adjust their fees regularly and not go to shareholders after three or four years and then seek a 50% increase or something.”
